STEPHEN MORRIS

"There will not be a more pleasant, more honest or more sincere piece of fiction this year... The story concerns a young English aviator in the twenties and the struggle to establish the aviation industry in the years just after the First World War. Here is pathos, tenderness and human understanding in the growth, development, disappointments and achievements of this young man. There are many incidents you will find hard to forget—the testing of the early planes, the death of a good friend, his marriage to a girl out of his class and the drama, excitement and perils of the first overseas flights... heartwarming, satisfactory, exceptionally rewarding"
